PORKY
PIG

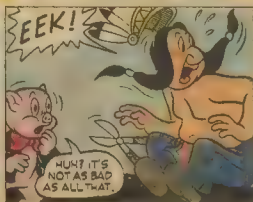

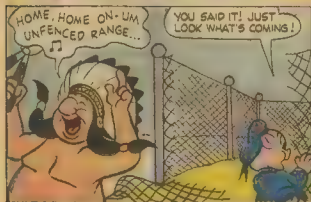

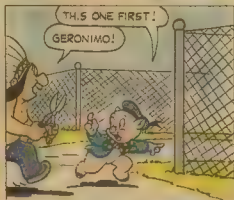

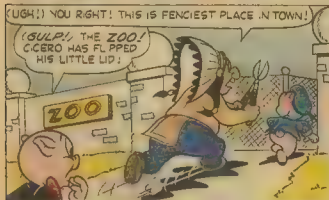

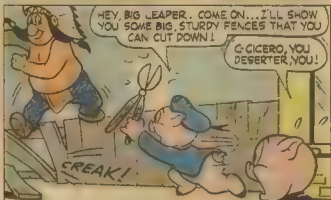

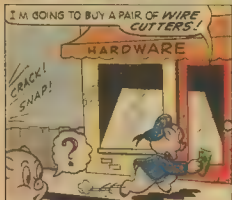

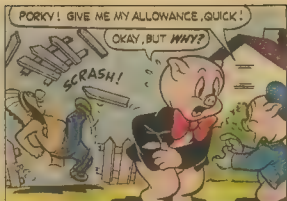

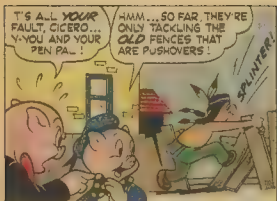

Injun Town

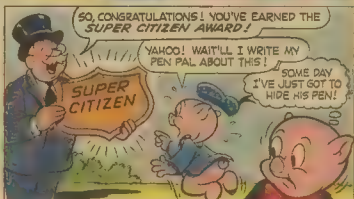

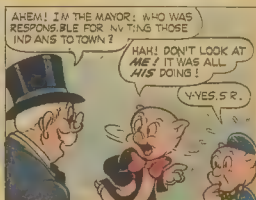

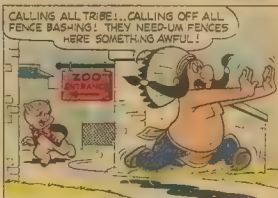

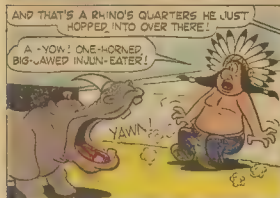

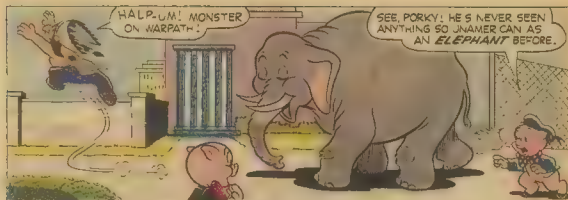

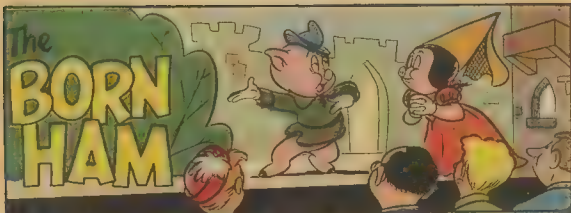

"Oh, Porky," Petunia wailed over the telephone one day. "I'm in a terrible fix. The girls in my club are putting on a play, and we can't find anybody to take the part of the leading man. Would you do it for us?"

"Wh-Who? M-Me?" Porky said with alarm. "No, thanks! I'd feel like a goof up there on a stage in front of a lot of strangers!"

"Oh, dear, I was afraid you'd say that," Petunia fretted. "I know how shy you are in front of strangers and crowds. Well, then," she sighed, "how about just reading the part until we can locate somebody else? That way we can go ahead with rehearsals."

"We serve cookies and cake for refreshments after every rehearsal," she added in tantalizing tones.

That settled it for Porky. He was willing to put up with feeling a little awkward in return for the promise of some treats to eat. "But I'm just helping out temporarily, you understand," he reminded Petunia.

"Of course!" his friend cooed reassuringly. But as she hung up the telephone, a shy twinkle sparkled in Petunia's eyes, and she couldn't help tittering at a thought which had popped into her head.

Petunia made a dozen more calls and then dashed to the playhouse to meet Porky.

Porky was amazed at the amount of happy activity which was going on. He recognized many of his own neighbors and friends helping with the construction of the scenery to be used in the play. "S-Say, this kinda looks like fun!" he enthused.

"Of course," Petunia nodded. "Now here's your script, and you start reading."

The director showed Porky where to walk and what to do, and, in no time at all, he was feeling right at home.

"There now, that wasn't so bad, was it?" Petunia said merrily when the rehearsal was over for the day.

"I g-guess not," Porky replied with relief. "But I'm still just filling in, you understand!"

"Of course," Petunia nodded, winking at the director who was standing nearby.

The rehearsals continued day after day, and before long Porky knew the leading man's part by heart. He noticed that more and more people seemed to be sitting in the auditorium each day, so he asked about it.

"They're just friends I've invited down to watch the rehearsals," Petunia explained. "Don't pay any attention to them."

"We still don't have a man to take your part," the director said to Porky one day. "But we're going to go ahead with a dress rehearsal tonight, anyway. We'll fill the auditorium with our friends and run through the whole play without stopping; just like it is the real thing. Okay?"

Porky nodded his approval, and that night he performed his part as best he could, hoping the rehearsal was going smoothly.

To his great surprise, when the final curtain was rung down after the last act, many of the people from the audience came backstage to congratulate him on his performance.

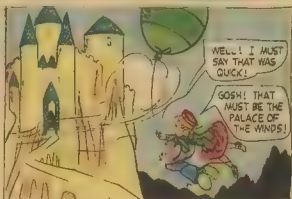

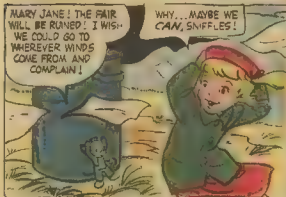

A sudden suspicion dawned on him, and his knees felt like water. "Y-You mean this wasn't a rehearsal at all?" he gasped.

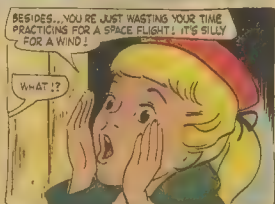

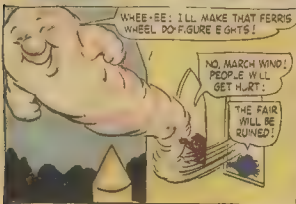

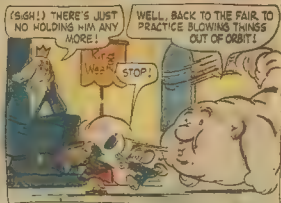

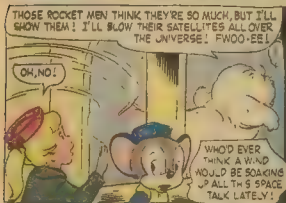

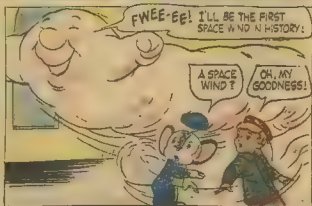

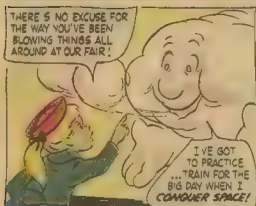

"It was the real thing!" Petunia giggled. "You might as well continue in the part now. Keep thinking of the audience as your friends, and you won't have a bit of trouble. Porky, you're a born actor!"

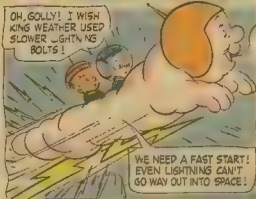

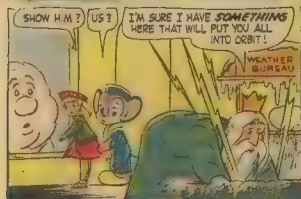

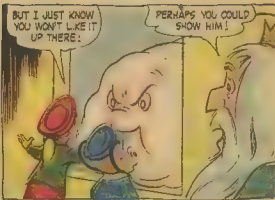

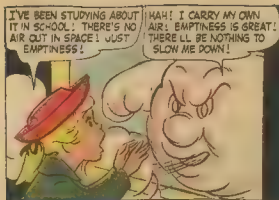

"G-Golly," Porky blushed. "M-Maybe that's because I'm a b-born ham!"
